

alliance in the so-called "historic compromise," Craxi threatened, would be met with the fullest resistance and denunciation by the Socialists.

With the DC "Fabian" wing, typified by Galloni, attempting together with the PSI leadership to isolate the PCI and Prime Minister Andreotti politically, a campaign is being organized by the most notorious corporatist in the trade-union movement, Giorgio Benvenuto of the national UIL confederation, to mobilize the mass of 650,000 unemployed Italian youth against the joint PCI-government economic program.

On Sept. 6, Benvenuto announced his campaign for a nationwide anti-unemployment drive aimed directly against the legislation worked out by the government in conjunction with the Communists to deal with the problem. A counter-statement was immediately issued by PCI Central Committee member Cervetti, warning that the "autonomisti" will be used in this youth mobilization to generate a "hot autumn." Already, the "autonomisti" have been deployed into the PCI's Unita festivals, attacking PCI members by the hundreds in Trieste and Milan. Benvenuto's campaign to exploit the rage of Italy's unemployed youth is expected to take off with a bang later this month, when a repeat of the Bologna riots of earlier this year is scheduled to take place in the very heart of PCI-controlled territory.

The full gamut of the fascist extraparliamentary left in Italy, from the Lotta Continua Maoists to the luridly fascist "Indians," is scheduled to hold mass demonstrations in the "Red City" of Bologna for a period of three days beginning Sept. 22 as a sign of protest against the "sell-out" PCI. When riots were staged at the city university earlier this year, armored cars were brought in by the local PCI government to deal with the thousands of Maoists and provocateurs shipped into the city by the trainload. The riots were then quickly subdued when Bologna's workers collaborated with the police. This time around, the Bologna riots are planned as only the first step in a campaign; the momentum is to be picked up and carried by the dregs of the trade-union movement through the offices of Giorgio Benvenuto. The daily Repubblica, controlled by Cuccia's ally Giovanni Agnelli of FIAT, has already published the first three installments in a series of articles by the notorious City of London flunkey Giorgio Bocca (a Socialist fellow-traveller) designed to give the "autonomisti" provocateurs the cover of legitimacy. Characterizing the "autonomisti" as "impoverished and tough Leninists," Bocca urges their cooperation with the trade unions in order to "solve" the problem of youth unemployment — by generating terrorism and chaos throughout the country.

French Steps Toward Terrorist Crackdown

The government of France has recently undertaken a crackdown on terrorist networks and training grounds located on French soil. In large part, the crackdown is a feature of the French thrust for economic cooperation with West Germany, and has included a belated effort to locate terrorist figure Klaus Croissant, wanted in West Germany and living in France in recent months. It has also included raids on the psychiatric clinics and "agricultural communes" operated as terrorist-selection centers on French and contiguous territory by Interpol and coordinating British-based and other intelligence networks.

But to date, the French government has been impeded in its current crackdown by evident infiltration and contamination of government offices and police forces by the same, identified intelligence networks associated with the international banking operations of the Chase Manhattan and Lazard Frères groups.

Nevertheless, and French crackdown is real, and coincides with other indications that European governments may soon take the action required to stop terrorism for good. Its first salvo was fired in mid-August, with the publication of exposés in the conservative southern paper, Le Méridional, targeting a number of "agricultural communes" concentrated in the southeast of France as obvious terrorist training centers. With connections and support from the Club of Rome's Sisco Mansholt, Swiss banking, and the United Nations' "Food and Agricultural Organization," communes in France's Ardeche Department such as that of Forcalquier, and others in France, Switzerland, and Austria named by Le Méridional, were the source of the Corsican and Basque "autonomist" terrorist movements which are controlled by agencies resident in London and associated with the British crown.

On Sept. 1, the "liberal" daily Le Monde protested that the communes, as "experiments" in returning to nature, were threatened by "rumors" such as those circulated by Le Méridional. Nevertheless, the French government this week issued an arrest warrant for one Pierre Conty, founder of a "commune" in the Ardèche region which functions as part of the overall network of training grounds. An all-out mobilization of available police forces from Lyon, Grenoble, and Montpellier is underway in the area to find Conty, whose fingerprints were found on a pair of glasses in an automobile used to carry out an Aug. 25 hold-up of the Crédit Agricole (agricultural credit bank) in Villefort, in which one policeman and two passers-by were killed. Another member of the commune is also wanted as a witness in the killings.

This week the government also decided to suspend state funding for a clinic at the Saint-Anne psychiatric hospital known as Etienne Roussel. This clinic, which will shut down as a result, is roughly the French equivalent of the Lincoln Detoxification clinic in New York, where drug addicts have been brainwashed and turned into the police-killers of the Black Liberation Army. Saint-Anne was itself started shortly before World War II by Jacques Lacan, a "psychologist" who trained many of France's leading Maoists at the Ecole Normale Supérieure in time to play a role in the May 1968 uprising against De Gaulle.

Lacan, who has taught at Saint-Anne for four years, was in charge of a series of conferences on psychology at the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes (EPHE) in 1963. The EPHE is now well known in France as a unit connected to the Washington, D.C. Institute for Policy Studies. There, ecologists, "autonomists," and other social "libertarian" movements have been created.

Aside from maintaining a well-publicized friendship with terrorist supporter Jean-Paul Sartre, Lacan is the director of the psychology collective at Editions Le Seuil (a known CIA publishing house), and is a specialist in Chomskyan linguistics, which is used to create belief structures for terrorists.

Despite its crackdown, the French government is holding back from ruthlessly pursuing a course to eliminate the terrorists entirely. For several months, Klaus Croissant, a lawyer for the Baader-Meinhof terrorists in West Germany and one of the controlling figures in international terrorism, has been living in France, even seeking political asylum there. Only now, after the kidnapping of West German industrialist leader Schleyer, and the issuing of an international arrest warrant for Croissant, has any effort been made to determine his whereabouts. Croissant was, in fact, allowed to be interviewed somewhere in France secretly on Sept. 7 by journalists working for Antenne No. 2, a state-controlled television station. The French conservative press, particularly France-Soir and L'Aurore have vehemently protested over this "red carpet treatment" being accorded Croissant by French television while he is a wanted man.

The French government is impeded not only by probable active sabotage on some level by elements in the Finance, Justice, and Interior Ministries, but also by its own refusal to go after the network of controllers and supporters of the terrorists, those like Le Monde, Le Matin, Le Nouvel Observateur, and Lacan, Sartre, et al., who apologize for terrorism as a "legitimate sociological phenomenon."

"Rent-a-crowd" street thugs and other lowlife have been ferried around Britain in recent weeks to instigate race riots, trade-union rebellions, and terrorist incidents as well as to create a phony antifascist hullabaloo, fostering a debate about possible military intervention to keep the peace.

The purpose of these stage-managed confrontations — run out of Britain's Transnational Institute (European arm of the Washington-based Institute for Policy Studies), the London Institute for Race Relations, and networks associated with former Interior Minister Roy Jenkins — is to undermine the political base of British Prime Minister James Callaghan and force him to comply with New York pressure for Schachtian-modeled hyperinflationary economic policies.

Most recently, rank and file delegates to the annual Trades Union Congress (TUC) staged an unexpected rebellion against Callahan's long-term economic strategy by threatening to overturn pledges by their leaders to preserve the remnants of the "social contract" between the Government and the labor movement. Egged on by left-wing agitators and "right to work" demonstrators — including many of the same groups responsible for other recent incidents of political violence — the delegates nearly threw out the 12-month rule (mandatory gap of one year between pay settlements) which they had agreed upon previously. Although the final vote went in the government's favor — after a personal appeal by Callaghan to the TUC delegates — the so-called "radicals" have made clear their intent to sow disruption in trade-union ranks and organize against the government's economic policies.

A similar pattern emerges in the widely publicized industrial dispute over the right of trade unions to organize at the privately owned Greenwich film processing factory. Here, demonstrators recruited by the NATO-run Socialist Workers Party and the extreme right-wing National Association for Freedom (NAFF) have been out in force all summer to incite clashes with police.

Another hotspot has been ignited with the announcement of President Carter's much-touted initiative to solve the Northern Ireland conflict. The deliberately vague and ambiguous Carter statement has had the effect of setting political groups and factions within them at each others' throats over the "meaning" of the Carter plan. Already one moderate political group has splintered into warring factions and has warned that their fall-back position might be to "stand aside and hand over to the men of violence." Splits and fissures have also emerged in the leadership of the terrorist Irish Republican Army. At the same time, security authorities have discovered a highly suspicious "hit list" which contains the names of terrorist controllers such as Roy Jenkins and Enoch Powell as well as plans for bomb attacks on British cities.

Callaghan's retreat from war against these easily identifiable nests of terrorists has spawned discussion in the press on the advisability of using troops to maintain public order if the "civil power" cannot cope with the mounting level of violence. Prominent former intelligence agent Lord Chalfont has attacked Callaghan in the pages of the London Times for "weak political leadership" in a society where "the rule of law is everyday being challenged."

Institute for the Study of Conflict director Brian Crozier and his board of counterinsurgency experts are advocating a "paramilitary third force" should police be unable to handle the new wave of terrorism.

Crozier is also among the chief backers of Tory leader Margaret Thatcher, who is being groomed for Callaghan's position. Thatcher is now on a nine-day tour of the U.S., which includes meetings with David Rockefeller and Henry Kissinger. Thatcher will also meet with nearly every member of the Carter Cabinet as well as National Security Council boss Zbigniew Brzezinski, Andrew Young, New York Senator Daniel Moynahan.
